The nineteenth annual Neurobiology of Learning and Memory conference was held in Park City, January 8-11, 1994. The conference was organized by Raymond Kesner, John Disterhoft, Jim McGaugh, Elisabeth Murray, Aryeh Routtenberg and Larry Squire. The conference was well attended with 70 scientists from all parts of the United States as well as 20 graduate and/or postdoctoral students.

The topics that were covered included 1) a "data blitz" which was led by John Disterhoft and Elisabeth Murray. The data blitz was designed to provide people the opportunity to tell the group what is most exciting, so that the information can be used as a basis for further discussion throughout the days of the conference. Each of the thirty people presented their latest exciting results for a 5 minute period. 2) "DNA transcription and mRNA stabilization factors in synaptic plasticity" which was led by Aryeh Routtenberg and with Larry Benowitz and Nora Perrone-Bizzozero as major participants. The session primarily dealt with the F1/GAP43 gene, which is a neuron-specific protein related to synaptic growth and plasticity. 3) "The glycine site of the NMDA receptor" which was led by John Disterhoft and with Jon Johnson, John Kemp, Joseph Moskal and Lucien Thompson as major participants. The session dealt with a variety of approaches emphasizing the importance of the glycine site for normal operation of the NMDA channel and the suggestion that modulators of this site may be powerful activators of behavioral learning and plasticity. 4) "Mossy fiber potentiation: Mechanisms of plasticity and memory" which was led by Ursula Staubli with Matthew Shapiro, Bryan Derrick, Joe Martinez and Ursula Staubli as major participants. The session dealt with work from different laboratories suggesting that plasticity of the mossy fibers and LTP are substrates for distinctly different forms of memory. 5) "Functional organization of limbic memory systems: Current views" was led by Elisabeth Murray with Larry Squire, Norman White, Howard Eichenbaum and David Gaffan as major participants. The session dealt with comparing and contrasting the mnemonic contributions of the amygdala, hippocampus and surrounding periallocortical and neocortical fields in both rodents and nonhuman primates. 6) "Configural association theory" was led by Peter Holland with Jerry Rudy, Mark Gluck and Michela Gallagher as major participants. This session discussed the issues of "Configural Association Theory" and considered its relation to other theories of hippocampal function and behavior. 7) "Controversies in the cognitive neuroscience of memory development" was led by Jeri Janowsky with Jocelyne Bachevalier, Patricia Bauer and Carolyn Rovee-Collier as major participants. This session highlighted controversies on a) whether there are multiple forms of memory during development, b) the time course of memory development, c) whether the neurobiology of learning and memory during development is different than that mediating different forms of memory in the adult animal. Evidence was presented from research on human memory development in infants and children, as well as neurobiological and behavioral data from studies using animal models.

All of the sessions of the conference were well attended and resulted in extensive discussion within each session as well as discussion throughout the conference period. It is hoped that many new ideas were generated as a result of the many excellent presentations and the ensuing discussions.
